
Urban Economic Revival in California

Posted by: Shay Fitzpatrick

on Apr 03, 2020

Tagged in: revitalization, economic development

While macro demographic, economic and societal trends continue to improve the prospects for California cities, not all will benefit to the same degree. This Thursday's "Urban Economic Revival in California" session, held at the California Society of Municipal Analysts (CSMA) conference in Napa, will explore the underlying conditions and local government and private sector actions associated with cities like San Diego and San Francisco, whose economic outlooks continue to improve.

The session will posit and address questions such as "Given the dissolution of redevelopment, how do cities attract private investment and employers to help revitalize older cities?" "Would a continuing drought affect the mix of urban versus suburban/exurban development?"

Joining Libby on "Urban Economic Revival in California" are Karen Ribble (Fitch Ratings) and John Shirey (City of Sacramento). Established in 1986, the California Society of Municipal Analysts \(CSMA\) is a non-profit organization that fosters professional development through discussions, meetings and presentations of issues relevant to municipal credit analysis.

Click here for the final agenda for this Thursday, November 5 conference.